I'm not implying that I don't like Linux, I like it a lot. However, a lot of companies that develop (or have developed) Linux end up abandoning it because it is not being used a lot and they don't have enough time to put effort on it. Is there a chance that they will use Linux for the next version of their software? A: Many large corporations (like IBM for example) used Linux until, say, 2008, but mostly for server-side stuff. Then they kind of lost interest. Linux is still a major component of the enterprise computing landscape; but it hasn't really achieved mainstream adoption on the desktop, except for niche use cases. Microsoft's Kin mobile phone was Linux-based. It was cancelled, before it could take off. A: Back in the 1990s, the primary reason for the development and use of Linux was the (rather silly) idea of "giving your hardware away for free", which (at the time) was a good thing. Sure, some people could use their computers when they had a broadband connection (and these were mostly students, in most places), but most people just sat at the computer waiting for it to load something, or they used it on the internet. It was fairly well-known then that Linux had much better performance than Windows for running a desktop, and this was more important than having
